

LANDSCAPES

from Around the World

Michael Reichmann

A LandMark Edition

Though taking photographs when I was ten years old, I don't think that there has been a day in the fifty-four years since, that doing photography, or writing about photography, or printing, or teaching, or simply just thinking about photography has not been a significant part of my life, even during periods when I made my living doing other things. It is simply a touchstone of my existence.

While I am known as a writer, teacher and reviewer – all of which I greatly enjoy doing – it is the making of images that live at the heart of my passion. Without it everything else seems hollow.

Though prints can be seen at my Toronto gallery and other galleries, my photographs are best viewed through my website. This is not an ideal product, because for me a photograph only comes to life as I watch it appear when in an actual print.

On-screen images are fine, as far as they go, but that's not far enough for me. Compared to a proper print they are only a pale reflection of my intention.

Though I teach and write about photography: technology and equipment, and share a passion for it with most photographers, it is the creative process that engages me the most and which I enjoy sharing with other photographers during my workshops and seminars. Though photography itself isn't usually a collaborative process it is definitely so one that engages others. Art needs both a creator and an audience. My passion for photography reaches its highest expression when I can share it with others through writing, reviewing, teaching, and especially through sharing my own work.

PROLOGUE: INTRODUCTION

I had met Michael Reichmann in 1976, but had never been to his home in Toronto. I had been invited to photograph a special occasion of his photography, and he had invited me to photograph a special occasion of his photography.
